Chip-maker Intel has said it is working with other major tech firms to fix flaws that could allow hackers to steal personal data from computer systems. The issue was originally linked to a flaw in Intel's chips, but the firm said this was "incorrect". "Many types of computing devices - with many different vendors' processors and operating systems - are susceptible to these exploits," Intel said. Google researchers first discovered the flaw last year. Google said the problem affected the basic electronic systems behind many devices such as computers and mobile phones.
